The Moab Museum invites community members to visit during the September Art Walk to view a pop-up exhibit interpreting prominent rock imagery sites along the Colorado River. The petroglyphs and pictographs found on canyon walls near Moab are so much more than mere decoration, they communicate messages across cultures and through time. This summer, the Museum partnered with Utah Humanities to produce a Humanities in the Wild video exploring the significance of local rock imagery sites with local archaeologist Don Montoya, and Images and interpretations of the iconic Birthing Rock panel near Moab will be a part of the pop-up exhibit on view during the September Art Walk.

Bertram Tsavadawa, a Hopi elder from Old Oraibi on Third Mesa in Arizona. Together they discussed petroglyph and pictograph interpretations and the cultures that have thrived throughout time along water corridors. Images of petroglyphs with accompanying interpretations from this project are on view at the Museum during the month of September.

Petroglyphs accessed from the Poison Spider trailhead were interpreted by archeologist Don Montoya and Hopi elder Bertram Tsavadawa as part of a recent Humanities in the Wild project.

Images of local rock imagery, as well as quotations from Montoya and Tsavadawa offering perspectives on the rock imagery, will be on view at the Museum for the September Art Walk.

The impacts of climate change are becoming more and more evident each year as communities across the globe experience extreme weather, including warming temperatures, devastating floods or drought, and disastrous wildfires.

And yet, the climate crisis is an opening—an invitation to co-create new ways of being together. How might we minimize harm, regenerate ecosystems, and further our connection, cooperation, and creativity?

The Moab Arts and Recreation Center, in partnership with the City of Moab Sustainability Department, invites artists to respond with works that speak to ecological emergence and adaptation, transmuting environmental grief into collective action, and dancing with change. The exhibition will coincide with Moab Festival of Science, Public Lands Day, and Utah Climate Week. Artists of all genders, backgrounds, and mediums are encouraged to submit up to three pieces of work to be considered. The final selections from this call for art will be displayed at our September Art Walk.
